Release Initially, the film had a very small cinema release with only 58 theaters in South Korea being selected to screen the film. The rest of the world's theaters were able to screen the film due to the efforts of its English co-director and co-screenwriter, Mark Duplass, who personally paid a fee to the Korean distributors of the film to screen the film in all of North America. Of the 58 theaters that played the film, they were almost all in the Incheon and Seoul areas. After the film screened in just a small number of theaters in South Korea, the film quickly caught on in online sites, with its YouTube video viewing reaching over 30 million views in just a few weeks time. International distribution The film was first released in North America in March 2011 via online streaming video, and later to theaters in August 2011. The film is distributed through the company Vertical Entertainment. The film was also released to United Kingdom theaters as a double-bill with James Franco's action comedy Warm Bodies (2013).
